When I was growing up my family had a boarding kennel, and animals were often abandoned. However, some dogs are so scared of her that they whine and are clearly agitated. A lot of the comments here criticise wolfdog owners as egomaniacs, and some may be, but the same could be said for the owner of any particular dog breed purchased for a certain reason.

From that point on, it was obvious that he was no longer safe to have anywhere near Discover Life in America. The full quote gives a different impression that the one you are trying to paint. My reading of this situation is that the "dominant" behavior in that dog was not natural nor instinctive, nor was it about controlling resources.

On occasion in captivity, subordinate wolves may rise up and challenge the dominant. I have 2 wolfdogs myself, they are mostly outdoor animals and very happy.
