The colonists were left to build their own governments and their own economy. They created career tracks that took year-old boys and turned them into brakemen, conductors and engineers. A trade in which monopoly had always been important found intense competition to be fatally destructive. The modern American factory was born. The bureaucracy was terrible, often missing deadlines. Many Americans distrusted these new, impersonal business organizations whose officers lacked personal responsibility while nevertheless carrying legal rights. Hamilton funded the debt with tariffs on imported goods and a highly controversial tax on whiskey. Transport to the region was exceedingly difficult until a railway was built. Their southern strategy the British won major victories at Charleston and Camden during the spring and summer of By these measures the American military would have great difficulty in defeating the British.
