The forward movement of his Third Corps placed it beyond close supporting distance on either flank and directly in the path of Longstreet's two attacking divisions. Now that guns were able to fire without recoiling, the crew were able to remain grouped closely around the gun, ready to load and put final touches on the aim, subsequent to firing the next shot. The first arms made in and early were for the sword bayonet, and later in almost all were made for the socket bayonet. When Legends Die. Menzies was subsequently promoted to second lieutenant. With new machinery and personnel from Richmond, the new cavalry carbine was put into production. This is the sixth installment and third from author Larry Peterson in University of Tennessee Press's new and interesting Command Decisions in America's Civil War series, which has been releasing titles at a almost blinding clip since the publication of the first

Many and varied were the items they supplied the Confederacy and which included an article, which focused on their wartime service, incorrectly identified their regiment as the 5th New York Cavalry.
