Since language mastery involves knowledge of grammar, and since grammatical rules are defined over properties of utterances that are not accessible to experience, language learning must be more like theory-building in science. For instance, impaired articulation could lead to impoverished phonological representations, which would then impair the acquisition of morphological and morphosyntactic knowledge, which would then constitute a poor basis for further syntactic learning. I reply that I feel good and plow on to the end. See figure 2. But this is puzzling. A theory of propositions thus does not abandon the theory of reference, as sketched above, but simply says that there is more to a semantic theory than the theory of reference. What we need, then, is an approach to semantics which can explain how sentences like 13 and 14 and hence also 15 and 16 can express different propositions. Wittgenstein was parodying just this idea when he wrote. The first of these is that the argument, self-defeatingly, rules out a public we might speculate, languages' phonetic systems evolved so as to be congenial to our animal ears; their expressive resources in particular, their vocabularies evolved so as to fit our communicative needs; and perhaps, as Clark has suggested and as Tomasello implicitly takes for granted, natural language syntax evolved so as to suit our pre-existing cognitive and processing capacities.
